FA'LSIFIER. n. ſ. [from falſify.]

1. One that counterfeits; one that makes any thing to ſeem what it is not.

It happens in theories built on too obvious or too few experiments, what happens to falſifiers of coin; for counterfeit money will endure ſome one proof, others another, but none of them all proofs. Boyle

2. A lier; one that contrives falſehoods.

Boaſters are naturally falſifiers, and the people, of all others that put their ſhams the worſt together. L'Eſtrange.

To FA'LSIFY. v. a. [falſifier, French.]

1. To counterfeit; to forge; to produce ſomething for that which in reality it is not.

We cannot excuſe that church, which through corrupt tranſlations of ſcripture, delivereth, inſtead of divine ſpeeches, any thing repugnant unto that which God ſpeaketh; or, through falſified additions, propoſeth that to the people of God as ſcripture, which is in truth no ſcripture. Hooker.

The Iriſh bards uſed to forge and falſify every thing as they liſt, to pleaſe or diſpleaſe any man. Spenſer on Ireland.

2. To confute; to prove falſe.

Our Saviour's prophecy ſtands good in the deſtruction of the temple, and the diſſolution of the Jewiſh œconomy, when Jews and pagans united all their endeavours, under Julian the apoſtate, to baffle and falſify the prediction Addiſon.

3. To violate; to break by falſehood.

It ſhall be thy work, thy ſhameful work, which is in thy power to ſhun, to make him live to ſee thy faith falſified, and his bed defiled. Sidney.

4. To pierce; to run through.

His creſt is raſh'd away, his ample ſhield
Is falſify'd, and round with jav'lins fill'd. Dryd.

Of this word Mr. Dryden writes thus: My friends quarrelled at the word falſified, as an innovation in our language. The fact is confeſſed; for I remember not to have read it in any Engliſh author; though perhaps it may be found in Spenſer's Fairy Queen. But ſuppoſe it be not there: why am I forbidden to borrow from the Italian, a poliſhed language, the word which is wanting in my native tongue? Horace has given us a rule for coining words, ſi græco fonte cadant, eſpecially when other words are joined with them which explain the ſenſe. I uſed the word falſify, in this place, to mean that the ſhield of Turnus was not of proof againſt the ſpears and javelins of the Trojans, which had pierced it through and through in many places. The words which accompany this new one, makes my meaning plain:

Ma ſi l' Uſbergo d'Ambedue perfetto,
Che mai poter falſarlo in neſſun canto.
Arioſto, cant. xxv.

Falſar cannot otherwiſe be turned than by falſifier; for his ſhield was falſed, is not Engliſh. I might indeed have contented myſelf with ſaying his ſhield was pierced, and bored, and ſtuck with javelins. Dryden.

Dryden, with all his effort, was not able to naturalize the new ſignification, which I have never ſeen copied, except once by ſome obſcure name-leſs writer, and which indeed deſerves not to be received. Id.

2. A lie; an errour; a falſe aſſertion or poſition.

FEE. n. f. [Feoh, Saxon; fee, Danish, cattle; feudum, low Latin; feu, Scottish.]

1. [In law.] All lands and tenements that are held by any acknowledgment of superiority to a higher lord.

All lands and tenements, wherein a man hath a perpetual estate to him and his heirs, &c. are divided into alleduum and feudum: alleduum is every man's own land, which he possesses merely in his own right, without acknowledgement of any service, or payment of any rent to any other. Feudum, of fee, is that which we hold by the benefit of another, and in name whereof we owe services, or pay rent, or both, to a superior lord. And all our land in England, the crown-land, which is in the king's own hands, in right of his crown, excepted, is in the nature of feudum; for though a man have land by descent from his ancestors, or bought it for his money: yet is the land of such a nature, that it cannot come to any either by descent or purchase, but with the burthen that was laid upon him who had novel fee, or first of all received it as a benefit from his lord, to him and to all such to whom it might descend, or be any way conveyed from him. So that no man in England has directum dominium, that is, the very property or demesne in any land, but the prince in right of his crown: for though he that has fee has jus perpetuum & utile dominium, yet he owes a duty for it, and therefore it is not simply his own. Fee is divided into two sorts; fee-absolute, otherwise called fee-simple, and fee-conditional, otherwise termed fee-tail: fee-simple is that whereof we are seised in those general words, To us and our heirs for ever: fee-tail is that whereof we are seised to us and our heirs, with limitation; that is, the heirs of our body. And fee-tail is either general or special: general is where land is given to a man, and the heirs of his body: fee-tail special, is that where a man and his wife are seised of land to them and the heirs of their two bodies. Cowel.

Now like a lawyer, when he land would let,

FLO'WER. n. s. [fleur, French; flos, floris, Latin.]

1. The part of a plant which contains the seeds.

Such are reckoned perfect flowers which have petala, a stamen, apex, and stylus; and what any flower wants either of these is reckoned imperfect. Perfect flowers are divided into single ones, which are not compoted of other small and which usually have but one single body compounded, which consist of many flowers making but one flower. Simple flowers are monopetalous, which have the body of the flower all of one entire leaf, though sometimes cut or divided a little way into many seeming petals or leaves; as in borage, bugloss: or polypetalous which have distinct petala, and those falling singly, and not altogether, as the seeming petals of monopetalous flowers always do; but these are further divided into uniform and difform flowers: the former have their right and left hand parts, and the forward and backward parts all alike, but the difform have no such regularity as in the flowers of sage and deadnettle. A monopetalous difform flower is likewise further vided into, first, semi-fistular, whose upper part resembles a pipe cut off obliquely, as in the aristolochia: 2d, labiate; and this either with one lip only, as in the acanthum and scordium, or with two lips, as in the far greater part of the labiate flowers: and here the upper lip is sometimes turned upwards, and to turns the convex part downwards, as in the chamæcissus; but most commonly the upper lip is convex above, and turns the hollow part down to its fellow below, and represents a kind of helmet, or monkhood; and from thence these are frequently called galleate, cucullate, and galericulate flowers; and in this form are the flowers of the lamium, and most verticillate plants. Sometimes the lamium is intire, and sometimes jagged or divided. 3d, Cumculate; that is, such hollow flowers as have on their upper part a kind of spur, or little horn, as the linaria, delphinum, &c. and the carniculum, or calcar, is always impervious at the tip or point. Compounded flowers are first discous, or discoidal; that is, whose flocculi are set to close, thick, and even, as to make the surface of the flower plain and flat, which, because of its round form, will be like a discus; which disk is sometimes radiated, when there is a row of petals standing round in the disk, like points of a star, as in the matricaria, chamæmelum, &c. and sometimes naked, having no such radiating leaves round the limb of its disk, as in the tanacetum: 2d, planifolious, which is composed of plain flowers, set together in circular rows round the centre, and whose face is plainly indented, notched, and jagged, as the lactuca. 3d, Fistular, which is compounded of long hollow little flowers, like pipes, all divided into large jags at the ends. Imperfect flowers, because they want the petals, are called flosculous, apetalous, and capillaceous; and those which hang pendulous by fine threads, like the ouli, are by Tournefort called amentaceous, and we call them coralul. The term campanaceous is used for such as are in the shape of a bell, and infundibuliformis for such as are in the form of a funnel. Miller
